

Norway's Prime Minister Jens Stoltenberg speaks to the press after a briefing at Ullevaal Hospital in Oslo - AFP

Police block the entrance to the the Ullevaal hospital, Oslo -AFP

EXPLOSIONS

rock Norwegian capital

Police evacuate a wounded woman -AFP

OSLO, (AFP) - Norwegian police on Saturday described the main suspect in twin bomb and shooting attacks that left at least 91 dead as a Christian fundamentalist.

A police official said that information gleaned on the internet suggested the 32-year-old ethnic Norwegian was a "Christian fundamentalist."

At least 84 people died in a shooting Friday at a summer school meeting organised by the ruling Labour Party on Utoeya, an island outside the capital, while seven were killed when a powerful bomb ripped through central Oslo, where the prime minister's office and several government buildings are located.

According to information the suspect posted online, he is an "ethnic" Norwegian and a "Christian fundamentalist," police official Roger Andersen said, adding his political opinions leaned "to the right," without giving further details.

An aerial view of Oslo's city centre shortly after the explosion -AFP

Rescue workers evacuate those injured -AFP

Rescue workers walk past a car flipped on to its side - AFP

A woman lies on the floor in front of Norway's Prime Minister office building -AFP

Broken windows are seen after an explosion near government buildings in Norway's capital Oslo -AFP